

"I Want To Report Suspected Animal Cruelty or Neglect." United States Department of Agriculture National Agriculture Library USDA, 4 Nov. 2014. Web. 7 Nov. 2014.

The United States Department of Agriculture website provides information on how to report suspected animal cruelty or neglect. One of the main problems surrounding the way factory farms treat their animals is the fact that they are never punished. This website gives an insight to why this might be happening. Each state has different procedures when it comes to reporting the abuse and the companies use these procedures to find loopholes and continue to abuse the animals.

The employees of the United States Department of Agriculture give these steps in correlation with state and national laws. The people who created this website and update it are employees of the United States government and are prohibited from publicizing false information making this site very reliable.

Suspected animal cruelty reports play a big role in the fight against cruelty on factory farms. This United States Department of Agriculture website gives the steps in which this report is handled and gives an insight of why the factories usually do not get in trouble.

Arora, Namit. "Animal Welfare." Humanist.com. 73.2 (2013): pg. 26-31. Academic Search Complete. Web. 7 Nov. 2014.

I was in awe reading Professor Aroras' article on animal welfare. It explains the bizarre feelings Americans have towards their pets and the lack of feelings they have towards the animals they eat for dinner. Maybe it's because they don't care how the animals are treated or maybe it's because they don't know the truth of what is going on behind closed factory farm doors. There have been many stories in the media of abused animals on farms but what is going to take for Americans to band together and stop this horrible situation?

Professor Arora travels to different universities in the Central University system in India. He teaches writing and animal psychology at all the campuses. Arora also travels to the United States to examine the animal welfare system and write about them. His work has been published on many successful websites and is planning on combining his work to publish a book.

"Animal Welfare" helps strengthen my argument that the issue of animal cruelty is overlooked by many people. Arora gives the perspective of an outsider who has not been persuaded by the big companies that everything they are doing is OK.

Stull, C.L. "Role of U.S. Animal Control Agencies in Neglect, Cruelty, and Abandonment Investigations." Journal of Animal Science. 5.4 (2014): pg.2342-2349. Web. 7 Nov. 2014.

When it comes down to it, animal control agencies are the ones responsible for making sure animals on factory farms are treated humanely. This article examines a study of local animal control services in the United States that investigate suspected cruelty and neglect and the outcomes of the investigations. This study was profound in the fact that it uncovered that most animal control agencies extracted the animals that were harmed on factory farms but less than 3% of the time were the factories taken to court to get punished.

Mrs. Stull is a professor at the UC Davis School of Veterinary Medicine. She received her PhD in Animal Science and describes her objective as a teacher as wanting to promote the well-being of agricultural animals in commercial systems. She has been acknowledged for her work for the well-being of animals on many occasions.

The information from this study gave me a better understanding of what the local animal control agencies actually do. I also learned the facts about these agencies including their budget and number of employees. While reading this article I became more aware of what I could include in my solution to make it more plausible.
